

Plato (427-347 B.C.)

A	B	C	D
ART eikones (“icons”)	REALITY res (“things”) is represented by	MATHEMATICAL dionia (“thoughts” or “archetypes”)	TRUTH eide (“idea” or “ideal image”)
Represents things artistically	art and/or math	Represents things mathematically	Everything pre-exists here.
Changing World of the Senses		Mathematical Thought	Outside Time; Beyond Change and History; Universal; The Ultimate Truth
You know eikones by conjecture.	Validation of “things” comes from belief.	Mathematical thought is a means to understanding.
A painting, sculpture or words describing a tree that is merely representational.	This is all we can see, touch, smell, taste, hear. It is limited by our perception.	Measurements of the tree that are not quite perfect (because of our limited perception).	The real tree as we are never able to perceive.
POET/ARTIST represents a mere “shadow” an imperfection of things (representing reality), is too much in love with himself.	EROTIC PERSON is too much in love with the senses (not just sex, but anything sensual).	SCIENTIST/MATHEMATICIAN is too cold-blooded, too detached from reality, as well as from himself.	PHILOSOPHER is in love with Truth, Knowledge, and Reason— and is therefore the “best” kind of person.
Painting or image of a bed.	The bed as a thing that we can see, touch,... know it with our senses.	The calculations of a bed (the measurements,...).	The TRUTH of the bed, the idea of the bed, the “real” bed (that we cannot sense with our limited senses).

PRODUCTIVE ART

MIMESIS
“OKAY”

inspiration/madness

MIMETIC RELATIONSHIP
“NOT OKAY”

Three Possible Definitions of a Muse

1. The artist's own passions (suspect).
2. Another writer (e.g., Homer is the muse of other epic poets, a “poet's poet”).
3. Comes from a god in some way (“ideas” Block D)—highly suspect, probably a lie:
 - arrival at, not by reasoning, but by mystical insight that is momentary (madness?) and tricky
 - by perceiving the idea through the material world (anticipating transcendentalism), these people who do this must be (logically) a very pure and small cluster of people, a cult of some kind.
 - But what good are these people if others (like Plato) cannot relate to these mystical inspirations?
 - Or the inspiration may be little more than pure emotion.

All of this is so difficult to understand and is, therefore, unsafe (potentially immoral).

A little more (adding to the Aug. 28th lecture).

Art/Literature Is Useless

- Why bother with art? It has no real function. It is trivial.
- Art is not real; it doesn't involve all the dimensional properties of reality.
- With art, the concept of the the diety is becoming depersonalized, abstract.
- Interpretations are a waste of time. Each person has his/her own version of what a piece means; you can't ask the artist what it means (reliably). There is no valid, conclusive interpretation to be made.
- It is better to gain ideas of reality (Block D) and forget about poetry/art (Block A); the goal of obtaining a full idea (Block D) is superior to settling for a mere image (Block A).
- Art/poetry doesn't give much insight into how to put order into life.
- There is no logic to art/poetry.

What ARE the arts?

1. A part of the imagination (fictions, or imperfect perceptions of the Truth)
2. Acting by means of powerful emotions
3. Dealing with illusion

Art/Literature Is Immoral

- Three approaches:
 1. The poet speaks to the audience in his own voice —that is acceptable.
 2. The poet speaks in the voice of someone else (mimics): an image of an image of reality (a perception of a perception)— that is always evil.
 3. The poet does a mixture of #1 and #2 (such as an epic novel, rather than an epic poem), another kind of attempt at mimesis—that is sometimes evil, certainly suspect.
- The image of an image of fiction is lies-upon-lies is very evil.
- Identifying a muse and/or inspiration is so difficult, and is therefore questionable, potentially evil.
- Representing love as a passion or other emotion is evil, always.

The arts are NOT:

1. Knowledge
2. Reality
3. Useful

Aristotle (384-322 B.C.)

CAUSES	GENERAL AESTHETICS	TRAGEDY
1. Material	1. Medium	1. Language, Rhythm, Harmony (Diction/Song)
2. Formal	2. Object	2. Imitation of men in action (plot, character, thought by imitation)
3. Efficient	3. Manner	3. Spectacle
4. Final	4. Pleasure & Knowledge	4. Katharsis (Catharsis)

The Four Pleasures

1. Pleasure of recognition
2. Pleasure of execution
3. Pleasure of knowledge
4. Pleasure of the medium

The Six Elements of a Play

1. PLOT
2. CHARACTER
3. THEME
4. LANGUAGE
5. RHYTHM
6. SPECTACLE

A little more (adding to the Aug. 28th lecture).

Portrayals

1. better than they are (tragedy)
2. worse than they are (comedy)
3. as they are (?)

Mimesis is a positive thing (not evil).

Four Classifications of Character

1. ETHICS of character: moral purpose, choices between bad and good and how these choices contribute to pity and fear
2. PROPRIETY: defining the audience (age, sex, class, . . .); once this definition (these classifications) have been made, certain patterns of audience interest appear; propriety acts according to the patterns of the classifications of audience; not only does the character have to behave appropriately, but also speak and have an appropriate role
3. VERSIMILITUDE (true to life): believability; the character has to be plausible, enough “like us” to be acceptable as human; this has nothing to do with character traits; villains are not human
4. CONSISTENCY: of thought and of action

PLATO	ARISTOTLE
   Socrates 470–399 B.C. Socrates encouraged his students to examine their beliefs. He asked them a series of leading questions to show that people hold many contradictory opinions. This question-and-answer approach to teaching is known as the Socratic method. Socrates devoted his life to gaining self-knowledge and once said, “There is only one good, knowledge, and one evil, ignorance.”    Plato 427–347 B.C. Born into a wealthy Athenian family, Plato had careers as a wrestler and a poet before he became a philosopher. After Socrates, his teacher, died, Plato left Greece. He later returned to Athens and founded a school called the Academy in 387 B.C. The school lasted for approximately 900 years. It was Plato who once stated, “Philosophy begins in wonder.”    Aristotle 384–322 B.C. Aristotle, the son of a physician, was one of the brightest students at Plato’s Academy. He came there as a young man and stayed for 20 years until Plato’s death. In 335 B.C., Aristotle opened his own school in Athens called the Lyceum. The school eventually rivaled the Academy. Aristotle once argued, “He who studies how things originated . . . will achieve the clearest view of them.”  	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Tended to think in terms of parts (pieces of the picture). • The poet/playwright writes as a result of divine inspiration. • The value of a work of art or literature is extrinsic (having value beyond itself); it must be useful. • Change is not good, potentially destructive. • Poetry makes one weak. • Poetry should teach. 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Tended to think in terms of wholes (the big picture). • The poet/playwright writes out of a universal need to imitate (and that's okay). • Value of a work of art or literature is intrinsic (having value within itself); it has its own value. • Change is inevitable, needed. • Poetry is empowering. • Poetry should give pleasure, and often there is pleasure in teaching/learning.
